Dear Families,

As you prepare for the beginning of the school year, normal back-to-school worries might be colliding with fresh uncertainties about the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic. Elizabeth Reichert, a professor at Stanford University, offers several tips for helping kids with back-to-school jitters:

- Start talking about going back to school—and listen to what your child has to say. What are they most looking forward to? What are they nervous about?
- Engage your child in the fun components of heading back to school, such as picking out school supplies or a new outfit—something they can get excited about.
- Walk or drive by the school together to build excitement. Or spend some time at the school’s playground to help them get used to the environment and build their confidence.
- Get back in the habit of going to bed and waking up earlier, especially if bedtimes have shifted during the summer months. Try to reestablish other school year routines that worked well for the family.

According to Professor Reichert, if your child is still nervous, listen to and acknowledge their concerns. Ask questions and work together to figure out a plan while also communicating to your child that it’s their job to go to school. Children are remarkably resilient and adaptable. After a period of adjustment, many will find their groove.

Finally, remember that our staff know this is a big transition for your child, and we’re always here to help while also prioritizing their health and safety!

Sincerely,
Pearl Tokar
